casuistry (ˈkæzjuːɪstrɪ, ˈkæʒ(j)uː-). [f. CASUIST + -RY. App. at first contemptuous = 'the casuist's trade'; cf. sophistry, Jesuitry, foolery. A term of more respectful application would prob. have been casuism: Fr. has la casuistique, as if 'casuisties'.]

The science, art, or reasoning of the casuist; that part of Ethics which resolves cases of conscience, applying the general rules of religion and morality to particular instances in which 'circumstances alter cases', or in which there appears to be a conflict of duties. Often (and perhaps originally) applied to a quibbling or evasive way of dealing with difficult cases of duty; sophistry.

Morals* II. vi. 247 Granted that duties may clash, or that general rules may be modified by special circumstances, it is surely most important to determine beforehand, as far as we can, what those circumstances are, and, in the case of clashing duties, which should yield to the other. Now this, and this alone, is the task which 'Casuistry' or the attempt to 'resolve cases of conscience' proposes to itself.

cat (kæt), sb.[1] Forms: 1 catte, catt, 2-7 catt, 4-6 catte, (3-7 kat, 6 katte), 1- cat. [The ME. and mod. cat corresponds at once to OE. cat and ONF. cat. The name is common European of unknown origin: found in Lat. and Gr. in 1-4th c., and in the modern langs. generally, as far back as their records go. Byzantine Gr. had κάττα (in Cæsarius c 350) and later κάττος, as familiar terms = αἴλουρος; mod.Gr. has γάτα from Ital. Latin had catta in Martial a 100, and in the Old Latin Bible version ('Itala'), where it renders αἴλουρος. Palladius, ? c 350, has catus, elsewhere scanned cātus (Lewis and Short), and prob. in both cases properly cattus. From cattus, catta, came all the Romanic forms, It. gatto, Sp., Pg. gato, Cat. gat, Pr. cat, ONF. cat, F. chat, with corresponding feminines gatta, gata, cata, cate, chate, chatte. The Teutonic forms recorded are OE. cat, catt, ON. kött-r (:—kattuz) masc., genit. kattar (Sw. katt, Da. kat); also OE. catte ? fem., WGer. katta* (MLG. katte, MDu. katte, kat, Du. kat, also Sw. katta), OHG. chazzâ (MHG., mod.G. katze) fem.; OHG. had also chataro, MHG. katero, kater, mod.G. and Du. kater, he-cat. The OTeut. types of these would be kattuz* masc., kattôn-* fem., kat(a)zon-* masc.; but as no form of the word is preserved in Gothic, it is not certain that it goes back to the OTeut. period. It was at least WGer. c 400-450. It is also in Celtic: OIr. cat masc., Gael. cat com., Welsh and Cornish cath f., Breton kaz, Vannes kac'h m. Also in Slavonic, with type kot-: OSlav. kot'ka f., Bulg. kotka, Slovenish kot m., Russ. kot m., kotchka, koshka f., Pol. kot (koczur m.), Boh. kot m.,

(These forms indicate extensive communication of the word, but do not fix the original source. History points to Egypt as the earliest home of the domestic cat, and the name is generally sought in the same quarter; Martial's attribute might incline us to a Slavonic or Teutonic origin: c 75 MARTIAL xiii. 69 Pannonicas nobis nunquam dedit Umbria cattas. a 250 Baruch vi. 21 ('Itala') Noctuæ et hirundines et aves, similiter et cattæ [LXX. καὶ οἱ αἴλουροι].]

A name given to a vessel formerly used in the coal and timber trade on the north-east coast of England; see Falconer's description (quot. 1769).

(The name is unknown to the oldest of the Elder Brethren of Trinity House, Newcastle (aged 82), and to the oldest North Sea pilots there. One of the latter, however, remembers to have heard as a boy the joke 'Do you know when the mouse caught the cat?' (the Mouse being a sand-bank in the Thames); and several remember the expression cat-built in the early part of the century. The last 'cat-built' ship is said to have been lost more than 30 years ago. N.E.D.) cata-, cat-, cath-. Gr. κατα-, κατ-, καθ-, a preposition used in comp. with the senses a. down (locally); b. down (of diminution, reduction, consumption, waste), away, entirely, 'up'; c. implying disparagement or abuse (= mis-); d. inferior, subsidiary; e. down upon, against (as blows fall); f. against and reflected back, hence, answering to, according to, alongside of, each to each; g. intensive, downright, thoroughly, completely; h. hence, like Eng. be-, making a verb transitive. All these senses occur in Eng. words into which cata- enters; most of these are adapted or formed from compounds already made in Greek, others follow or extend Greek analogies. See also KATA-.

a. Representing the Latin catacumbas (catecumpas), or (?) ad catacumbas, used as early as the 5th c. in connexion with the subterranean cemetery under the Basilica of St. Sebastian, on the Appian Way, near Rome, in or near which the bodies of the apostles Peter and Paul were said to have been deposited: this is the only sense in which the word occurs in English before the 17th c.

b. In later times applied (in the plural) to all the subterranean cemeteries lying around Rome (which, after having been long covered up and forgotten, were fortuitously discovered in 1578). In the singular applied to a single crypt or gallery.

2. In a wider sense, applied to any subterranean receptacle of dead bodies, as the catacombs of Paris, which are worked-out stone-quarries (see quot.); also fig. place of entombment of former races of animals, etc.

1836 Penny Cycl. VI. 359/2 The catacombs of Paris could not be called catacombs with any propriety until very recent times, when, by a decree of the French government, all the churchyards were emptied of their contents, and the skulls and bones sent to the spacious subterranean quarries, where they are now arranged in a manner that is grotesquely horrible. 1845 DARWIN *Voy. [NOTE.—The name regularly applied to the Roman catacombs during the first four centuries, when they were in use, as well as during the succeeding four or five centuries, while they were still objects of attention and care, was cœmētērium. Catacumbas, catecumbas, appears in the 4th (?), 5th, and following centuries only in connexion with the name of the cemetery of St. Sebastian on the Appian Way, which is distinguished as Cœmeterium Catacumbas, or shortly Catacumbas. In other cases Catacumbas appears to be used as name of the locality, or perhaps of the part of the Appian Way, in which this cemetery lay. The earliest instances are:

?a 400 Inscr. in Orelli 4575 Comparaui..uiuus in catacum[b]as a[d] lumenarem a [f]ossore.. 411 [or ?354] Martyrology (Bucher ad Canon. Romæ, Cœmeteria Calisti juxta Catacumbas.

The evidence does not settle the disputed question whether the name originally belonged to the cemetery, or (as the majority of investigators now appear to think) to the locality. Some of the other cemeteries were named from their locality, e.g. Ostiense, Ad Septem Columbas, Ad Duas Lauros (names of taverns), but most from a personal name as Calisti, Domitillæ, Cyriacæ. The word catacumbas was in later times treated as an acc. pl., with nom. sing. catacumba; but in earlier use it appears to be invariable. To account for this, some have surmised that the full name was Ad Catacumbas, others that it was itself a Greek phrase κατὰ κύμβας. The recorded meanings of Gr. κύμβη are 'the hollow of a vessel, a drinking vessel, cup, or bowl (whence a possibility that κατὰ κύμβας was the name of a tavern); a boat, L. cymba; a knapsack, wallet'. But the question how a Greek phrase was likely to become the name of something near Rome, when it is not known what that thing was, is manifestly futile; still more profitless are conjectures that the word might contain the Greek preposition combined with a Latin, Sabine, or Celtic word or root, which may be seen in works or articles treating of the Catacombs. There appear to be no examples of the application of the word to the other Roman subterranean cemeteries in ancient times, though catacumba is apparently used by Joannes Diaconus (9th c.) of those of Naples: see Du Cange. But the actual extension of the name belongs to modern times, since the discovery of 'Subterranean Rome'.]

1836 BERZELIUS in Edin. New Phil. Jrnl. XXI. 223 Many bodies .. have the property of exerting on other bodies an action which is very different from chemical affinity. By means of this action they produce decomposition in bodies, and form new compounds into the composition of which they do not enter. I shall also call Catalysis the decomposition of bodies by this force. 1842 W. GROVE *Corr. Phys. This sense was also original in Eng.; and continued in Scotch to 16th c. (see sense 1); but for this the central OF. chacier, chace was adopted in form chace-n by 1300, and catch was gradually confined to its present sense, which is unknown to French and the other langs., but is that of OE. læcc(e)an, ME. lacchen, lachen. With the latter, cachen seems to have been very early treated as synonymous, and at length entirely took its place. Hence, app. the pa. t. cahte, cauhte, cau3te, caught, like lahte, lauhte, lau3te, laught, which was used along with the regular cacched, catchte, catched, and during the present century has superseded it in literary use (though catched, cotched is still widely prevalent in dial. or vulgar speech).]

a. A name given to several astringent substances, containing from 40 to 55 per cent. of tannin, which are obtained from the bark, wood, or fruits of various Eastern trees and shrubs. They are used in medicine, and in tanning, calico printing, and dyeing. Also attrib. or Comb.: catechu brown, a brown colour produced by the use of catechu as a dye.

The name was apparently first applied (in Europe) to the pale sort called also GAMBIER, obtained from the leaves and young shoots of Uncaria or Nauclea Gambir; this is the Catechu of Pharmacy (Syd. Soc. Lex.): when first brought to Europe in the 17th c. it was from its appearance believed to be an earth, and called Terra Japonica. The dark sort obtained from the wood of Acacia Catechu, is more commonly called CUTCH; of this Pegu Catechu is a good variety. category ('kætɪgərɪ). [ad. L. catēgoria, a. Gr. κατηγορία accusation, assertion, predication, abst. sb. from κατήγορ-ος accuser, etc.: see CATEGOREM.]

1. Logic and Metaph. A term (meaning literally 'predication' or 'assertion') given to certain general classes of terms, things, or notions; the use being very different with different authors.

a. Originally used by Aristotle, the nature and meaning of whose ten categories, or predicaments (as, after the Latin translation, they are also called) has been disputed almost from his own day till the present; some holding that they were 'a classification of all the manners in which assertions may be made of the subject', others that they were 'an enumeration of all things capable of being named, the most extensive classes into which things could be distributed', or again, that they were 'the different kinds of notions corresponding to the definite forms of existence'. Hence many criticisms of Aristotle's classification, with modifications of it, or the substitution of new 'categories,' proposed by the Stoics, and later philosophers, according as they viewed them logically or metaphysically.

The ten 'categories' or 'predicaments' of Aristotle were: 1 Substance or being (οὐσία), 2 Quantity, 3 Quality, 4 Relation (πρός τι), 5 Place, 6 Time, 7 Posture (κεῖσθαι), 8 Having or possession (ἔχειν), 9 Action, 10 Passion.

1588 FRAUNCE Lawiers Logike I. ii. 10 b, These generall heades of argumentes..sometimes..are called Categoremes, and the handling or discoursing of the same Categories. 1677 GALE Crt. Gentiles II. iv. Proem 4 Objective Ideas or real Beings, considered in Logic, are reduced by the Aristoteleans..to Ten Categories or Predicaments. 1724 WATTS Logic (1736) 25 The famous ten Ranks of Being, called the ten Predicaments or Categories of Aristotle, on which there are endless Volumes of Discourses formed by several of his Followers. 1849 ABP. THOMSON Laws Th. §97 Logicians in almost every age have endeavoured to frame schemes of classification in which things should be arranged according to their real nature. To these the name of Categories..has been given. 1858 MANSEL Bampton Lect. iii. (ed. 4) 49 Existence itself, that so-called highest category of thought. c 1866 GROTE Aristotle I. 144 We may illustrate the ten Categories of Aristotle by comparing them with the four Categories of the Stoics. Ibid. 149 Galen also recognizes five Categories; but not the same five as Plotinus. 1882 E. WALLACE tr. Aristotle's Psychol. 5 The first point..is to determine in which of the higher classes soul is included, and what is its generic character —whether, in other words, it is an individual thing and real substance, or a quality, or a quantity, or any other of the categories, as they have been distinguished. 1883 LIDDELL & SCOTT Grk. Lex. s.v., The categories are a classification of all the manners in which assertions may be made of the subject.

b. Kant applied the term to: The pure a priori conceptions of the understanding, which the mind applies (as forms or frames) to the matter of knowledge received from sense, in order to raise it into an intelligible notion or object of knowledge.

1829 SIR W. HAMILTON Disc. (1853) 26 The Predicaments of Aristotle are..objective, of things as understood; those of Kant subjective, of the mind as understanding..In reality, the whole Kantian Categories would be generally excluded from those of Aristotle..as determinations of thought, and not genera of real things. 1856 MEIKLEJOHN tr. Kant's Crit. Pure Reason 64 In this manner there arise exactly so many pure conceptions of the understanding, applying a priori to objects of intuition in general, as there are logical functions in all possible judgments..These conceptions we shall, with Aristotle, call categories, our purpose being originally identical with his, notwithstanding the great difference in the execution. Table of the Categories. 1. Of Quantity: Unity, Plurality, Totality. 2. Of Quality: Reality, Negation, Limitation. 3. Of Relation: Of Inherence and Subsistence (substantia et accidens), of Causality and Dependence (cause and effect), of Community (reciprocity between the agent and patient). 4. Of Modality: Possibility—Impossibility, Existence—Non-existence, Necessity— Contingence. 1877 E. CAIRD Philos. Kant II. viii. 342 Certain general conceptions which are principles of relation for all the manifold of sense..these are the categories.

c. Hence in more general use (see quot. 1901). Also attrib.

1901 BALDWIN Dict. Philos. I. 161/2 The term category, in post-Kantian philosophy, comes to mean any relatively fundamental philosophical conception. 1938 G. RYLE in *Proc. Arist. O. URMSON Encycl. Western Philos. 79/2 Today the word 'category' is used by philosophers, if at all, for any supposedly ultimate type, without any settled convention about what it is a type of.

2. a. A predicament; a class to which a certain predication or assertion applies.

Quakers* v. xxvi. 187 He that cannot hear a thing, as being necessarily absent, and he that cannot hear it, as being naturally deaf, are to be placed in the same Category. 1855 MACAULAY *Hist. cater-cousin ('keɪtə,kʌz(ə)n). [derivation and original literal meaning doubtful.

The ordinary conjecture (since Skinner) has been that cater is F. quatre four, used in the sense of quatrième fourth, 'from the ridiculousness of calling cousin or relation to so remote a degree' (Johnson); but etymologically this receives no support from French (where quatre-cousin would be absurdly impossible), nor from the Eng. use of cater in CATER *sb.*², CATER adv., or CATERCAP, nor is there any trace of the word having ever been quater, quatre, or quarter; moreover Johnson's explanation seems hardly to suit early usage, however it may have influenced later use.

Fewer difficulties appear in supposing cater to be the Eng. CATER *sb.*¹ or *v.*¹, and taking cater-cousins as originally those who were 'cousins' by being catered for or boarded together, or by catering for each other: cf. companion lit. 'fellow bread-eater'. It would be easiest perhaps to account for such a formation from the verb, but as there is not at present evidence that this was in use so early as 1547, we must consider the possibility that the derivation was cater sb. + cousin, perh. as = 'catering cousin': cf. esp. foster-father, -mother, -brother, -sister, etc.]

A term formerly applied to persons on terms of 'cousinship', intimate friendship, or familiarity with each other, who, though not cousins by blood, were 'next cousins' in some respect, or perhaps called each other 'cousin' from some community of life, interests, or employments (cf. COUSIN, to CALL cousins 17 b.). to be (or be made) cater cousins: to be good friends, to be on the best of terms. It still survives as a traditional expression (chiefly from Shakspere), but without any distinct notion of its intrinsic meaning.

1547 LATIMER Serm. & Rem. (1845) 425 Corrupt nature [is] against the will of God; and so to be natural may seem to be cater-cousin, or cousin-germain with to be diabolical. 1583 STUBBES *Anat. caterpillar ('kætəpɪlə(r)), sb. Forms: 5 catyrpel, 6 -pyllar, catirpiller, 7 catterpiller, 7–8 -pillar, 6– caterpiller, -pillar. [Catyrpel, in Promp. Parv., may be merely an error of the scribe for catyrpelour (or -er); Palsgr. has the full form. Generally compared with the synonymous OF. chatepelose, lit. 'hairy or downy cat' (cf. the Sc. name hairy woubit 'woolly bear'), of which the ONF. would be catepelose. This is a possible source, though no connexion is historically established: the final sibilant might be treated in Eng. as a pl. formative, and the supposed sing. catepelo would be readily associated with the well-known word piller, pilour, pillager, plunderer, spoiler. This is illustrated by the fact that in the fig. sense, piller and caterpiller are used synonymously in a large number of parallel passages (see sense 2). The regular earlier spelling was with -er; the corruption caterpillar (? after pillar), occasional in 17th c., was adopted by Johnson, and has since prevailed.

(Some think the word a direct compound of piller. The giving to hairy caterpillars a name derived from the cat, is seen not only in the French word cited, but also in Lombard. gatta, gattola (cat, kitten), Swiss teufelskatz (devil's cat); cf. also F. chenille (:—canicula little dog), Milan. can, cagnon (dog, pup) a silk-worm (Wedgwood). Cf. also catkin, F. chaton, applied to things resembling hairy caterpillars.)] caterwaul ('kætəwɔ:l), v. Forms: 4-5 caterwrawe, 4-6 -wawe, 6 katerwaue, 6-8 catterwawl, -wall, 8 -wowl, 7-9 -waul, 7 -waule, caterwaule, -wawl, catterwrall, (catwrall), 8 catterwaw, 6- caterwaul. [This occurs in the various forms caterwrawe, -wawe, -wrawl(e, -wawle, -waul. The second element appears separately in the vb. wrawen used (of a cat) by Caxton, wrawlen, wraule of cats, squalling children, etc., frequent in Googe, Tusser, Holland, and others from c 1570 to 1625 or later; waul is of doubtful occurrence before 1600. The precise relation between these is not clear; all are prob. imitative of the sound, but whether the forms in -l are formed on the others (cf. mew, mewl, Ger. miauen, miaulen, and F. miauler) is doubtful.

Forms akin to wrawe, wrawl in other langs. are Da. vraale, Sw. vråla, to roar, bellow, bawl, Norw. dial. råla, in the north of Norway 'to cry as a cat', LG. wralen (Bremen Wbch.) said of a stallion in heat, also of an ill-behaved man, 'to be noisy and unruly'; cf. also Bavarian rauen, rauelen 'to howl, whine', said esp. of the cat, also Swiss rauen, räulen, the latter esp. of the cry of the cat when in heat. (Wr- becomes r- in HG.: an OE. wreawlian*, ME. wrawlen would answer exactly to Bav. rauelen.) The sense of the Ger. words also comes near the Eng., since both in Chaucer and in the transf. use of the 16–17th c., the word was spec. applied to the cry and behaviour of the cat when 'after kind'. As to the -waul form, an exact LG. counterpart katterwaulen '(von Kindern) schreien und heulen wie streitende Katzen' is given by Schambach, Göttingisches Grubenhagen'sches Idiotiken 1858, but its history is uncertain; cf. also Icel. vála to wail.

Cater is, of course, connected with CAT, but the form is not certainly explained: some would see in it a parallel to Du. and Ger. kater male cat, which may once have existed in OE.; but the word appears too late to prove this. Others would take -er as some kind of suffix or connective merely.]

4. Catholic Epistle: a name originally given to the 'general' epistles of James, Peter, and Jude, and the first of John, as not being addressed to particular churches or persons. The second and third epistles of John are now conventionally included among the number.

It is not certain that this was the original sense of ἐπιστολὴ καθολικὴ, since some early writers appear to use it in the sense 'genuine and accepted' (see CANONICAL): but the attribute has been understood in the sense 'encyclical' or 'general' since the 10th or 11th c.

II. In ecclesiastical use.

The earlier history of this lies outside English, and may be found in such works as Smith's Dict. Christian Antiq. or in Lightfoot's Ignatius I. 398–400, 605–607; II. 310–312. 'Ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία 'the catholic church' or 'church universal', was first applied to the whole body of believers as distinguished from an individual congregation or 'particular hody of Christians'. But to the primary idea of extension 'the ideas of doctrine and unity' were super-added; and so the term came to connote the Church first as orthodox, in opposition to heretics, next as one historically, in opposition to schismatics. Out of this widest qualitative sense arose a variety of subordinate senses; it was applied to the faith the Church held, to particular communities or even individual membcrs belonging to it, and especially in the East, to cathedrals as distinguished from parish churches, then later to parish churches as opposed to oratories or monastic chapels. After the separation of East and West 'Catholic' was assumed as its descriptive epithet by the Western or Latin Church, as 'Orthodox' was by the Eastern or Greek. At the Reformation the term 'Catholic' was claimed as its exclusive right by the hody remaining under the Roman obedience, in opposition to the 'Protestant' or 'Reformed' National Churches. These, however, also retained the term, giving it, for the most part, a wider and more ideal or absolute sense, as the attribute of no single community, but only of the whole communion of the saved and saintly in all churches and ages. In England, it was claimed that the Church, even as Reformed, was the national branch of the 'Catholic Church' in its proper historical sense. As a consequence, in order to distinguish the unreformed Latin Church, its chosen epithet of 'Catholic' was further qualified hy 'Roman'; but see sense 7. On this analogy ANGLO-CATHOLIC has been used by some, since about 1835, of the Anglican Church.

5. Catholic Church, Church Catholic: the Church universal, the whole body of Christians.

6. a. As an epithet, applied to the Ancient Church, as it existed undivided, prior to the separation of East and West, and of a church or churches standing in historical continuity therewith, and claiming to be identical with it in doctrine, discipline, orders, and saeraments. (a) After the separation, assumed by the Western or Latin Church, and so commonly applied historically. (b) After the Reformation in the 16th c. claimed as its exclusive title by that part of the Western Church which remained under the Roman obedience (see 7); but (c) held by Anglieans not to be so limited, but to include the Church of England, as the proper continuation in England, alike of the Ancient and the Western Church.

(Whatever the application, the implied sense is 'the Church or Churches which now truly represent the ancient undivided Church of Christendom'.)

7. As applied (since the Reformation) to the Church of Rome (Ecclesia apostolica catholica Romana) = ROMAN CATHOLIC, q.v. (Opposed to Protestant, Reformed, Evangelical, Lutheran, Calvinistic, etc.)

ROMAN CATHOLIC is the designation known to English law; hut 'Catholic' is that in ordinary use on the continent of Europe, especially in the Latin countries; hence historians frequently contrast 'Catholic' and 'Protestant', especially in reference to the continent; and, in familiar non-controversial use, 'Catholic' is often said instead of Roman Catholic.

cattle ('kæt(ə)l), sb. Forms: 3–5 (occas. 6) catel, (4 cadel, catil, catele, cathel, katel, -ell, ketele, 4–5 (occas. 6–7) catell, catelle, 4–6 catayl, 5 catail, catayll(e, catal, -ale, 5–8 -all); 6–8 cattel, cattell, (6–7 cattal, -all, cattaile, 6 cattayle); 7– cattle. See also CHATTEL. [ME. catel, a. ONF. catel (= central OF. chatel, Pr. captal, capdal):—late L. captāle, L. capitāle, neuter of the adj. capitālis head-, principal, CAPITAL, used subst. in mediæval times in the sense 'principal sum of money, capital, wealth, property'; cf. mod. Eng. CAPITAL = stock in trade. Thus Papias has 'capitale, caput pecuniæ, capitis summa', the Catholicon 'capitale, pecunia'. Under the feudal system the application was confined to movable property or wealth, as being the only 'personal' property, and in English it was more and more identified with 'beast held in possession, live stock', which was almost the only use after 1500, exc. in the technical phrase 'goods and catells (cattals)' which survived till the 17th c. In legal Anglo-French, the Norman catel was superseded at an early period by the Parisian chatel; this continued to be used in the earlier and wider sense (subject however to legal definition), and has in modern times passed into a certain current use as CHATTEL, so that the phrase just cited is now also since 16th c. 'goods and chattels'. Down to 1500 the typical spelling was catel; in the 16th c. this became cattel, cattell; only since 1600, and chiefly since 1700, spelt cattle. As this spelling is never found in earlier use, and, hence, never in the earlier sense, it would be possible to treat this sense as a separate word Catel, property; but on the other hand the modern sense has all the forms catel, cattel(l, cattle, according to date, and the history is better elucidated by treating the word as a historical whole. CHATTEL, however, as a distinct modern form and sense, is dealt with in its own place.

OF. (besides the ch- forms, for which see CHATTEL) had, according to dialect and date, the forms catel, katel, cathel, cateul, cateil. Hence the ME. variants cathel, catail, -ayl. The Norman word was again latinized as catellum, catallum, the latter esp. current in English law-Latin, whence the forms catal(l, cattal(l, so frequent in 15–16th c., esp. in the legal phrase 'goods and cattals'.]

†2. a. As an individual sing. = CHATTEL, with collective pl. originally in association with 'goods' or other pl. noun. Obs.

This use was evidently derived from law-Latin, in which catallum, catalla were so used. Cf. cum suis catallis omnibus mobilibus, cited by Du Cange, from Leg. Edw. Conf. p. 894, and the phrase melius catallum the best chattel, droit de meilleur catel, the heriot, ibid.

3. Often used in the phrase goods and cattel; later more frequently goods and cattels, of which the extant form is goods and chattels: see CHATTEL.

As in this sense the form cattals is specially prevalent, it looks like a translation of a legal Anglo-Lat. bona et catalla. Du Cange quotes from Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 35 Cum decimis omnium terrarum, ac bonorum aliorum sive catallorum.

II. Live stock. (Forms catel, cattel(l, cattle.)

4. a. A collective name for live animals held as property, or reared to serve as food, or for the sake of their milk, skin, wool, etc.

The application of the term has varied greatly, according to the circumstances of time and place, and has included camels, horses, asses, mules, oxen, cows, calves, sheep, lambs, goats swine, etc. The tendency in recent times has been to restrict the term to the bovine genus, but the wider meaning is still found locally, and in many combinations. As this sense was originally comprised under 1, distinct instances before 1500 are scarce.

caucus ('kɔ:kəs). [Arose in New England: origin obscure.

Alleged to have been used in Boston U.S. before 1724; quotations go back to 1763. Already in 1774 Gordon (Hist. Amer. Rev.) could obtain no 'satisfactory account of the origin of the name'. Mr. Pickering, in 1816, as a mere guess, thought it 'not improbable that caucus might be a corruption of caulkers', the word "meetings" being understood'. For this, and the more detailed statement quoted in Webster, there is absolutely no evidence beyond the similarity of sound; and the word was actually in use before the date (1770) of the event mentioned in Webster. Dr. J. H. Trumbull (Proc. Amer. Philol. Assoc. 1872) has suggested possible derivation from an Algonkin word cau'-cau-as'u, which occurs in Capt. Smith's Virginia 23, as Caw-cawaassough 'one who advises, urges, encourages', from a vb. meaning primarily 'to talk to', hence 'to give counsel, advise, encourage', and 'to urge, promote, incite to action'. For such a derivation there is claimed the general suitability of the form and sense, and it is stated that Indian names were commonly taken by clubs and secret associations in New England; but there appears to be no direct evidence.]

1. In U.S. A private meeting of the leaders or representatives of a political party, previous to an election or to a general meeting of the party, to select candidates for office, or to concert other measures for the furthering of party interests; opprobriously, a meeting of 'wire-pullers'.

2. In English newspapers since 1878, generally misused, and applied opprobriously to a committee or organization charged with seeking to manage the elections and dictate to the constituencies, but which is, in fact, usually a representative committee popularly elected for the purpose of securing concerted political action in a constituency.

It was first applied in 1878, by Lord Beaconsfield and the Times newspaper, to the organization of the Birmingham Liberal 'Six Hundred', and thence to those which were speedily formed on its model elsewhere; the implication being that this was an introduction of 'the American system' into English politics, which deserved to be branded with an American name. But the name was grotesquely misapplied: in American use, a caucus is a meeting; English newspapers apply the caucus to an organization or system. Such organizations have since been, in one form or another, adopted by all parties; and caucus is now a term which partizans fling at the organizations of their opponents, and disclaim for their own.

1878 Times 31 July 10/4 The policy of the politicians of the Midland capital will bring upon us the 'caucus' with all its evils..The introduction and progress of the 'caucus' system among us. J. The meaning would then be a mound or dam made firm by stamping or treading down.

This is strengthened by the fact that calciāre in med.L. interchanges with calcāre to 'tread, stamp', and that calcāta, calcātum are actually found instead of calciāta, calciātum; also calcāgium for the droit de chaussée or road-toll. Diez and others have conjectured a vb. of type calceāre*, or calciāre*, from calx, calcem 'lime', and taken calceāta as something built or formed with lime; but there is no trace of such a sense in any language. Other med.L. forms were calcea mound, high way, paved way, also calceia, calcetum, calceta, all app. formed on the French. The OF. forms in -ie (from end of 12th c.), represent earlier ones in -iée; the Anglo-F. would be caucée, caucé.]

caviare, caviar (see below). Forms: 6 chauiale, 7 cavialy; 6 cavery, 7 caveari, caveary, (cauearee), cauiarie, 7-8 caviary; cavear(e, caveer, (7 gaueare, cavere, cavajar, cavayer, 8 cavier, kavia); 7- caviare, caviar. [Of uncertain origin, found in Turkish as khāvyār; in Italian in 16th c. as caviale (whence 16th c. F. cavial, Sp. cavial, 16th c. Eng. cavialy), also as caviaro, whence F. and Pg. caviar.

(It has no root in Turkish, and has not the look of a Turkish word. Redhouse in his MS. Thesaurus marks it as Italian-Turkish, looking upon it as borrowed from Italian.' Prof. Ch. Rieu.)

In English occurring with great variety of spelling and pronunciation, after Italian and French, with various native modifications. Originally, cavi'āly, -'āle, -'ārie, -'āre was of 4 syllables, with accent on the penult, as in Italian, but was sometimes reduced to 3 syllables, by slurring -iā-, as -yā-, and later with the accent shifted to the first syllable. As early as 1625, the final -e, in caviare, caveare, was often dropped in speech, and later also in writing, giving caviar, cavear (cf. F. caviar), pronounced (kævɪ'ɑ:(r), -'ɛə(r)), sometimes (kæv'jɑ:(r), -'jɛə(r)), and perh. also with accent shifted ('kævɪɑ:(r), -ɪə(r), -jə(r)). About 1700, prevalent forms were ca'vear, ca'veer, riming with prepare, and cheer; the latter pronunciation appears to have been the only one in common use in the end of the 18th c., for Walker, 1797, who spells caviare and pronounces (kə'vɪə(r)), says,

'Either the spelling or the pronunciation of this word should be altered .. the ancient spelling seems to have been Caviare; though Buchanan and Bailey, in compliance with pronunciation, spell it Caveer, W. Johnston Cavear, and Ash, as a less usual spelling, Cavier.'

Smart (1846) pronounces (kæv'jɛə(r)), Webster has the accent on first syllable ('kævɪɑ:(r)); prevalent pronunciations in England c 1890 were (kævɪ'ɑ:(r), kæv'jɑ:(r)), 'etymologically the best' (N.E.D.), also (kævɪ'ɛə(r)), and as in Smart. The prevalent pronunciation in the late 20th century is as in Webster. Shakspere's cavi'arie, and Swift's ca'veer, are recognized archaic forms.]

[In its actual form, referred to Cayenne, the chief town of French Guiana (founded 1634); but this is app. only popular etymology, as the name in Tupi (Brazilian) is given by Martini, p. 419, as kyýnha, quiýnha, also quiya. Gul. Piso, De Indiæ utriusque Re Nat. et Med. (1658) has 'qviya sive Piper Brasiliensis. The name Cayenne Pepper is unknown to French, and the Ger. Cayenne-pfeffer is prob. from Eng. (The somewhat archaic pronunc. (ˌkaɪ'ɑ:n) survives from the earlier form.)]

cayman, caiman ('keɪmən). Forms: 7 caimain, 9 kay-, kaiman. [In Sp. and Pg. caiman, F. caïman, app. from Carib. Martini, Galibi (Mainland Carib) Dict. has 'cayman crocodilus'; Rochefort (c 1660) Iles Antilles 225 'le crocodile que les insulaires nomment cayeman. Littré cites Carib Acayoúman 'crocodile', from Dict. Fr. Caraïbe of P. Raymond Breton, 1661.

Very positive statements, however, assert the word to be African, from Congo; Pigafetta 1598 (trans. in Yule) says In this river (Zaire or Congo)..mighty great crocodiles, which the country people there call caiman.' And Cuvier Règne Animal, Sauri (transl.) IX. 196 says 'The slaves on their arrival from Africa, at sight of a crocodile, gave it immediately the name of cayman. It would appear from this that it was the negroes who spread the name throughout America'. But as Bontius 1631 (cited by Yule) says Cayman is the name 'per totam Indiam' (i.e. the East Indies), the name appears to be one of those like anaconda and bom, boma, which the Portuguese or Spaniards very early caught up in one part of the world, and naturalized in another.]

(recorded of date 1428) and the derived ceiling (1380), ceiled, with the cognate sb. found as CYLL in sense of 'canopy' c 1500, celure, found as syllure, sylure ? a 1400, the derivation is doubtful. The group is not very old in Eng., and traces of it in French are scanty.

Three sources have been suggested: (1) L. cēlāre, F. celer (11th c. in Littré) to hide, conceal, cover up; (2) L. cælāre to carve, engrave in relief; (3) L. cælum sky, vault of heaven. If L. cēlāre could be shown to have acquired in late L. or Romanic the simple sense of 'cover', it would suitably explain the Eng. words in all their uses; but such is not the case, and in particular, F. celer does not appear to approach the required sense. In favour of L. cælāre (cf. cieler Godef.) there are certainly early quotations (see sense 1, and CEILING 1) in which 'carve', 'carving', is a possible sense; but nothing of the kind occurs under CELURE, and if ceil ever meant 'carve' this sense evidently soon entirely gave way to one congruous with that of CELURE. On the other hand we have the known fact that med.L. cælum, It. cielo, F. ciel, acquired the sense of 'canopy, vault, roof, tester of a bed, etc.'; and there are traces of a derived vb. cælāre to canopy or vault, whence cælātum, cœlātūra, in senses identical with or derived from cælum. Difficulties are that while ceil v. and celure were so common in 15–16th c. English, and can hardly be connected with L. exc. through Fr., their occurrence in OF. itself is extremely rare: a single instance of cielee pa. pple. (with variants celee, chelee, couverte) has been noted in Chrestien de Troyes, Ywain (ed. Förster 964). It is possible that celeūre*, celure*:—L. cælātūra was common in Anglo-French, and thence passed into English, but the whole subject remains for the present beset with conflicting difficulties; the apparently certain point being that we cannot separate the Eng. words from cælum, ciel, canopy. See CELURE.]

1. a. A solid inflammable material consisting essentially of soluble cellulose nitrate and camphor, used in the manufacture of many articles, esp. photographic film. orig. U.S., as a trade-name.

Invented in America, and first patented in Gt. Britain in April 1871, as a material for dental plates. In its manufacture the cellulose is first reduced by acids to pyroxyline (gun-cotton), camphor is tben added, and the mixture subjected to immense hydraulic pressure. It may then be moulded by heat and pressure to any sbape, and it becomes hard, elastic, and capable of taking on a fine finish. (The Specification of Hyatt's first British patent (1871, No. 1025) does not contain the name.)

Celt[1] (sɛlt, kɛlt). Also Kelt (kɛlt). [a. F. Celte, ad. L. Celta, sing. of Celtæ, in Gr. Κελτοί. (A later Gr. Κέλται, in Strabo, etc., was probably from L. Celtæ.) For conjectures as to a possible derivation, see Rhŷs, Celtic Britain (1884) 2.]

1. Hist. Applied to the ancient peoples of Western Europe, called by the Greeks Κελτοί, Κέλται, and by the Romans Celtæ.

The Κελτοί of the Greeks, also called Γαλάται, Golotæ, appear to have been the Gauls and their (continental) kin as a whole; by Cæsar the name Celtæ was restricted to the people of middle Gaul (Gallio Celtico), but most other Roman writers used it of all the Galli or Gauls, including the peoples in Spain and Upper Italy believed to be of the same language and race; the ancients apparently never extended the name to the Britons.

2. A general name applied in modern times to peoples speaking languages akin to those of the ancient Galli, including the Bretons in France, the Cornish, Welsh, Irish, Manx, and Gaelic of the British Isles.

This modern use began in French, and in reference to the language and people of Brittany, as the presumed representatives of the ancient Gauls: with the recognition of linguistic affinities it was extended to the Cornish and Welsh, and so to the Irish, Manx, and Scottish Gaelic. CELTIC has thus become a name for one of the great branches of the Aryan family of languages (see CELTIC); and the name Celt has come to be applied to any one who speaks (or is descended from those who spoke) any Celtic language. But it is not certain that these constitute one race ethnologically; it is generally held that they represent at least two 'races', markedly differing in physical characteristics. Popular notions, however, associate 'race' with language, and it is common to speak of the 'Celts' and 'Celtic race' as an ethnological unity having certain supposed physical and moral characteristics, especially as distinguished from 'Saxon' or 'Teuton'.

celt[2] (sɛlt). [ad. (reputed) Lat. celt-es (or ? celte, ? celtis) 'stone-chisel, sculptor's chisel'.

The received or Clementine text of the Vulgate has in Job xix. 24 Stylo ferreo, et plumbi lamina, vel celte sculpantur in silice; but, though this is the reading of some MSS., the Codex Amiatinus and others read certe 'surely'. Some hold certe to be the original reading (representing l ᵓd of the Heb., 'for ever' of the Eng., which is not expressed by the LXX), and take celte as an erroneous alteration of some kind; others think celte a genuine word, and suppose that it was originally a marginal gloss on stylo, which was erroneously taken into the text, and subsequently altered to certe by some one to whom it was perhaps unfamiliar. But the independent evidence for a word celtes or celte is slender. The 'vetus inscriptio Romæ', cited by Du Cange, is a late forgery, and celte in it is app. from the Vulgate. One of the miscellaneous undated glosses in the Glossarium C. Labbæi (Stephens' Thesaurus) is 'Γλυφεῖον Celte', but this is prob. later than the Vulgate variant reading, and may be founded on it. Later also than the Vulgate is the gloss on Sidonius Epist. vii. 3 (Anecd. Oxon., Class Ser. I. v. p. xi. and 50) 'Hoc caelum, ut hoc celte, celtis, instrumentum est quo caelatur,' which shows the ordinary explanation of the word in the Middle Ages. Celtes occurs however in two charters given in Lacomblet Urkundenbuch für die Geschichte des Niederrheins, II. 331 (anno 1267) 'meatum seu transitum.. ex fovea capituli Coloniensis, ad educendum celtes seu fracmina lapidum per viam eandem', and II. 382 (anno 1319) 'quod nulli frangentes lapides seu alii quicumque proicient seu mittent celtes seu alia fragmenta in ipsam foveam'. Here the meaning is 'pieces or fragments, ? chips', of stone; the relation of this to the Vulgate word is uncertain. In Welsh, moen cellt, with the assumed meaning 'flint stone', occurs in the Triads of Wisdom (16–17th c.), in Myv. Arch. III. 246; and cellt is also said to be (or to have been) known in Breconshire, in the sense of 'shell' of a nut, etc.; but the status of the word is altogether obscure, and its alleged senses help the question little. In any case, celtes, whatever its orgin and character, was assumed, on the authority of the Vulgate, to be a genuine word; and, as such, the term was admitted into the technical vocabulary of Archæology, about 1700. 'In Beger's Thesaurus Brandenburgicus 1696 a bronze celt adapted for insertion in its haft is described under the name of celtes' (Ll. Jewitt Holf-hours among Eng. Antiq. 1877, p. 32). Apparently the general adoption of the word by antiquaries was influenced by a fancied etymological connexion with CELT[1]: thus the Grand Dict. of Larousse explains it as 'sorte de hache gauloise en bronze'.]

An implement with chisel-shaped edge, of bronze or stone (but sometimes of iron), found among the remains of prehistoric man. It appears to have served for a variety of purposes, as a hoe, chisel, or axe, and perhaps as a weapon of war. 3. A hundredth. ? Obs.

1685 J. WARNER in Boyle Hist. Air xvii. (1692) 134 The Mercury subsided 9 Cents of an Inch.

4. In various monetary systems the term used for the hundredth part of a standard unit.

a. In United States of America (also in Canada, British Guiana, and many other British colonies): The hundredth part of a dollar; a copper (or nickel) coin of this value, nearly equal (c 1890) to a half-penny of Great Britain. (Often taken as the type of the smallest current coin; whence such expressions as 'I don't care a cent for'.) See also RED a. 3 c.

Apparently the first mention of cent occurs in the letter of Robert Morris to the U.S. Congress in 1782, suggesting that the American monetary unit should be the $\frac{1}{1440}$ of a dollar, and that a coin equal to 100 of these or $\frac{5}{72}$ of a dollar (about $3\frac{3}{4}$d. Eng.) should be made, and called a cent. This proposal was not taken up; but it may have suggested the name 'cent' for the coin = $\frac{1}{100}$ of a dollar, ordained by the Continental Congress on 8 August 1786 (see quot.). There exists, however, an American copper token, commonly called the Washington cent, bearing on one side a head in a wreath with the legend 'Washington and Independence', and date '1783'; on the other the words, 'One Cent', and the exergue $\frac{1}{100}$. But it is not certain that 1783 represents the date of issue; this token was probably struck as late as 1789, the date 1783 being merely that of the conclusion of the War of Independence. Previously to the coining of the cent, or $\frac{1}{100}$ of a dollar, and down to 1789, accounts were kept in dollars and ninetieths, a relic of the time when the Spanish piastre or piece of eight reals, called by the colonists 'dollar', was worth 7*s.* 6*d.* (90 pence) of the money of account of Maryland and Pennsylvania. (From notes communicated by the late Prof. J. W. Andrews of Marietta Coll., Ohio.)

1. A plant, of which the medicinal properties were said to have been discovered by Chiron the centaur; two species were distinguished, Centaurion majus, and C. minus (also lepton). The herbalists identified these (probably correctly) with two Gentianaceous plants, More or Yellow Centaury (Chlora perfoliata), and Common or Lesser Centaury (Erythræa Centaureum). Hence Centaury is sometimes used as the book-name for all the species of Erythræa.

1. Of or relating to the centre of gravity, or to the process of finding it.

centrobaric method (Math.): a method of determining the area of a surface, or the volume of a solid, generated by the revolution of a line or surface respectively about a fixed axis, on the principle that the superficies or solid so formed is equal to the product of the generating line or surface and the length of the path of its centre of gravity; sometimes called the theorem of Pappus.

Klaproth, in 1807, changed the names to cererium and cererite 'lest they should appear to be derived from cēra, κηρός wax', but the change was not accepted (Dana).]

One of the chemical elements: a rare metal, discovered in the mineral called CERITE; it has the colour and lustre of iron, and takes a high polish, which it retains in dry air, but in moist air it becomes covered with coloured films like heated steel; it is malleable and ductile, of specific gravity 6·63 to 6·73. 6. By a change of construction, a person or agent is said to be certain to do a thing, when the fact that he will do it is certain. The use thus attaches itself logically to 1, and in such a sentence as 'the town is certain to be taken', certain might be referred to that sense.

Different as this seems to be from sense 1, it is hardly separable from it in a large number of examples: thus, in the first which follows, the hour was quite 'certain' or 'fixed', but it is not communicated to the reader; to him it remains, so far as his knowledge is concerned, quite indefinite; it may have been, as far as he knows, at any hour; though, as a fact, it was at a particular hour. (The absolute uses are in B 4-6.)

cesspool ('sɛspu:l). Forms: 7 cest-, 9 sus-, sess-, 8- cesspool. [Of uncertain derivation.

The form cesperalle has suggested connexion or popular confusion, with SUSPIRAL breathing hole, air-hole, ventilator, q.v. The form cestpool, if genuine (compared with the dial. 'cist, a cesspool' in Halliwell) has suggested that the initial element may be a contraction of cestern, CISTERN, or at least that it has at some time been associated by popular etymology with that word. Prof. Skeat compares the form suspool with the dial. words suss 'hogwash', soss 'anything dirty or muddy' (Halliwell); others have proposed derivation from CESS sb.[1] bog. More suitable is that from It. cesso privy (:—L. secessus place of retirement, privy, drain), esp. as this is also commonly used for cessino the solid contents of the cesso, 'materie grosse che si cavano dalle cloache delle case, che servano per ingrasso dei terreni' (La Crusca). The spelling sess-pool taken with the essential meaning of a 'pool for the retention of sediment', might indicate connexion with L. sedēre, sess-um in sense 'to sink, settle down'. But all these are merely suggestions, calling for further evidence.]

ch, a consonantal digraph, which in various languages (e.g. Welsh, Spanish, Czech) is treated as a distinct letter, placed in the Alphabet after c. In English it is not so treated formally, but in its characteristic and proper sound (tʃ) which it has in all native words, it practically adds an additional symbol to the alphabet. It has, however, in English other values; viz. those in chyle, and champagne, which might be expressed otherwise by k and sh; and that in loch, which occurs only in Scotch, Welsh, or foreign words.

The combination ch was foreign to native Roman spelling; it was introduced to represent the Greek aspirate or affricate X (as Θ, Φ, were similarly represented by th, ph). In Latin practice, however, simple c was often substituted, e.g. χάρτης, charta, carta, χαιρέφυλλον, chærephyllum, cærefolium, and this represented the actual pronunciation, for in the development of the Romanic languages, ch in popularized words was treated precisely as c. But in these languages, the symbol ch has been laid hold of for various purposes. In Italian it is a supplemental symbol used to indicate the hard or (k) sound of c before the vowels i and e, where c itself stands for (tʃ), as in archi ('arki) pl. of arco, chi (ki):—L. qui. In very early French, it also occurs in the writing of some dialects, or some scribes, with the value of (k); but its typical OF. use was to represent the palatalized sound which Central Old French developed from original c (k) before a, as in L. carrus, cārus, causa, OF. char, chier, chose, but which Northern Old French, on the other hand, developed from c before e and i, as in chertain, cachier, cherise, where Central Old French had c (= ts), certain, chacier, cerise. The symbol ch was not used (or only accidentally) in OE.; for, although the sound (tʃ) was already developed in English before the 10th c., it was still written c(e), as in ceosan, ceaster, fecc(e)an. But at the Norman Conquest, the symbol ch was introduced from France, and used not only for the new French words as charite, richesse, but also in the OE. words as in cheosen, chester, fecche, etc. This value of the digraph has ever since been retained in English, while in French the sound was at length worn down from (tʃ) to (ʃ), as in chief, chef, OF. (tʃ(i)ɛf) now (ʃɛf), Eng. chief (tʃi:f). Where the c was originally double, and after a short vowel, the early writing was cch, but subsequently tch, as in OE. wrecc(e)a, ME. wrecche, now wretch. After a long vowel, simple ch is used, as in coach, teach, brooch; but sometimes (from various historical causes) simple ch occurs after a short vowel, as in rich, much, and tch (rarely) after a long vowel, as in aitch. After a consonant (preserved or lost) simple ch is used, as in perch, which, such.

The sound (tʃ) also occurs in Slavonic and many non-European languages, and is usually spelt ch in words thence taken into English, as in chabouk, chark, cheetah, chintz, chouse.

ch has the sound of (k) in words taken from Greek (or Hebrew through Greek) directly, or through Latin, Italian, or French, as in chasm, chimera, chirography, chyle, Rechabite. Only in a few of these, which were popular words in Romanic, e.g. cherub, archbishop, does the (tʃ) sound occur.

ch has the sound of sh (ʃ) in words from modern French; occasionally in words really from Old French, which are now erroneously treated as if from modern French, as chivalry, champaign.

ch has also the value of a guttural spirant (x); but this is not a native English sound, and is only used in English in an accurate pronunciation of Scotch, Celtic, Dutch, German, Slavonic, or Oriental words, in which the sound occurs. This sound existed in OE., but was there written h (and ȝ) as in burh, riht; for this the Norman scribes substituted the digraph gh (burgh, right), which is still retained, though the sound was lost in the 16–17th century. The same digraph is used to represent the Irish guttural spirant in lough, Monaghan, curragh; but the Celtic languages themselves use ch (as in Welsh Machynlleth and Gaelic clachan), and this is followed in Lowland Scotch, as in loch, pibroch, broch, tocher. The Old Teutonic languages generally used h or hh for this sound, as in Goth. mahts, OS. and OHG. maht, OE. meaht; but ch (rarely kh) was introduced initially, in Upper German, for the affricated sound of c (k) as chamara ('kxaməra), chirihha, chalch, whence it was extended to the spirant (x), and gradually substituted for the earlier OHG. spelling h, hh; so that this is now regularly written ch in German and Dutch: cf. Goth. ahtau, OS. and OHG. ahto, OE. eahta, mod.G. and Du. acht eight. The same symbol is used for this sound in most Slavonic languages which use the Roman alphabet, and thus sometimes in the Romanization of Russian X (Cherson, Astrachan), and also of the kindred sounds in some Eastern languages (where however kh is more general); and from all these sources it enters to some extent into English spelling, though the mere English reader usually pronounces it as (k).

As OE. c(e)-, c(i)-, has regularly become ch-, these constitute one important section of the ch-words in modern English; another consists of the Old French words in ch- from L. ca-. Of the rest, the chief are those derived from Gr. words in χ-, directly, or through L. (Italian, French) ch-. The remainder consist of a few words from Slavonic or non-European languages, or of onomatopœic origin.

ch initial interchanges with c, k, sh. Since Old Northern French retained the ca-, which Central French changed to cha-, che-, French words were often adopted in English in both forms, usually first from Northern (Norman) French, and afterwards from Central French. Sometimes one, sometimes the other, sometimes both, of these have survived, see e.g. CAITIFF, CAMEL , CAMPION, CHAMPION, CANNEL, CHANNEL, CANAL, CHALICE, CHAMP, CATCH, CHASE, CHACCHE, CATTLE, CHATTEL. The Northern English also in certain cases resisted the palatalization of OE. c, or took the parallel k form of Norse or Low German: hence northern caf, CAUK, KIRK, CARL, KEESLIP, beside southern CHAFF, CHALK, CHURCH, CHURL, CHEESLEP. Cf. on the other hand Kentish chalf = CALF. Confusion between ch, sch, sh, was not infrequent in ME., e.g. schin = CHIN, chever = SHIVER. This was sometimes graphical, but partly also dialectal; there are varieties of northern dialect which still use initial (ʃ) for (tʃ). Variant forms like CHACO, SHAKO, CHAGRIN, SHAGREEN, champoo, SHAMPOO, are of more recent, and chiefly of phonetic origin.

b. abbreviation of chapter, church. Ch. B. = L. Chirurgiæ Baccalaureus, Bachelor of Surgery. Ch. Ch. = Christ Church (Oxford). Ch. D. = L. Chirurgiæ Doctor, Doctor of Surgery.

†ch, 'ch, pron. dial. Obs. Aphetic form of ich, utch, southern form of the first personal pronoun I, occurring before verbal forms beginning with a vowel, h, or w; chiefly with auxiliary verbs, but also with others; as in cham (tʃam), (earlier icham) I am, cha, chave (earlier ichabbe) I have, chad I had, chard I heard, chill I will, chold, chud I would, chote I wot, etc.

Found in remains of s.e. (Kentish) dial. in 16th and early 17th c., in s.w. dialect 16–18th c., and often introduced in specimens of dialect speech in the dramatists. Now obsolete; though utchill = I will, and utchy = I, were still heard in 1875, in remote parts of Somersetshire. (See Prince L. L. Bonaparte in Phil. Soc. Trans. 1875–6 p. 580.) Utchy corresponds to the 16th c. CHE; see further under ICH.

chaise (ʃeɪz), sb. Also 8 chaiz, (shazess). [a. mod.F. chaise (chaize Cotgr.), a phonetic alteration of chaire (so Pazis for Paris, etc.), established in the ordinary sense 'chair', whence by extension 'sedan-chair', and by transference a wheeled vehicle for travelling in. In this later sense alone chaise passed into English, notwithstanding that chair had itself here received the same development (see CHAIR sb.[1] 11, which however was not always an exact synonym of this word, but often used as the name of a particular sort of chaise). (Cathedra, chair, chaise, are thus all forms of the same word.) The vulgar take (ʃeɪz) for a plural sb., and form on it a singular (ʃeɪ) CHAY, SHAY.

(The change of lingual r to z in French is a phenomenon widely exemplified. It appears fully established at Orleans in 15th c., but did not come down beyond 1620.)]

1. A term applied to various pleasure or travelling carriages, the exact application having varied from time to time:

a. A light open carriage for one or two persons, often having a top or calash; those with four wheels resembling the phaeton, those with two the curricle; also loosely used for pleasure carts and light carriages generally.

Kersey, Bailey, Ash and Johnson explain chaise as 'a carriage for pleasure drawn by one horse'; Todd says this was the case formerly, before post-chaises were in request, and defines it as 'A chaise and pair; a chaise and four: the term of later days for a light vehicle, with four wheels, drawn by two or four horses'.

chalcedony, calcedony (kæl'sɛdənɪ, 'kælsɪdənɪ). Forms: α. 4 calsydoyne, calcidoine; β. 4 chalcedun, 6–8 calcedon, 7–8 chalcedon; γ. (4–5 calcedonius), 5 calsydony, calcideny, (6 chalcedonium), 7 calchedonie, calsidonie, chalcidonye, 5– calcedony, 6– chalcedony. See also CASSIDOINE, -DONY. [The current form c(h)alcedony is directly adapted from L. c(h)alcedonius, used in the Vulgate to render Gr. χαλκηδών, in Rev. xxi. 19, the name of the precious stone forming the third foundation of the New Jerusalem, but found nowhere else. Adapted forms of the same word in OF. were calce-, calcidoine, whence the ME. calcidoine, calcedun; also cassidoine, whence ME. CASSIDOINE and its varieties, which are separately treated. The 16th c. chalcedon was perh. directly from N.T. Greek.

The word is of very complicated history. The L. is commonly assumed to be the same as the adj. chalcēdonius of Chalcedon in Asia Minor, as if it were 'Chalcedonian stone', but this is very doubtful. In interpreting the name in the Vulgate, which has the variant form carcedonius, the early writers identified it with a stone mentioned by Pliny xxvii. §§103, 104, where MSS. have the variants carchedonia, charcedonia, calcedonia, calchedonia, carchedonius, said to be found in North Africa, and to be brought by way of Carthage (Καρχηδών), which, from the description, could have nothing to do with the chalcedony of the moderns. Isidore has carchedonia; Epiphanius de Gemmis iv, says it is produced ἐν Καρχηδόνι τῆς Λιβύης. The carchedonius or chalcedonius is mentioned and moralized upon by a whole catena of writers, including esp. Bæda; but to none of them was it more than a traditional name, about which there clustered notions originally derived from Pliny with an accretion of later fables. The first to try to identify it with any known stone was apparently Albertus Magnus (1205-1282), who may have had in view some form of the stone to which the name is now given. (See the exhaustive article of Schade Altdeutsches Wbuch. 1363.)]

A precious (or semi-precious) stone, which in its various tints is largely used in lapidary work: a cryptocrystalline sub-species of quartz (a true quartz, with some disseminated opal-quartz), having the lustre nearly of wax, and being either transparent or translucent.

It is not safe to carry the modern application back before the 16th or at earliest the 15th c.; and references to earlier notions come down to the 17th. In modern lapidary work, chalcedony receives different names according to its varieties of colour and structure, as agate, cornelian, cat's eye, chrysoprase, onyx, sard, etc. Most of the varieties were included by Pliny under his jaspis. chalet ('ʃæleɪ, ʃale). [F. chalet (not châlet, as often in English books) a Swiss word (in la Gruyère pronounced tsalet), supposed to have been introduced into Fr. by Rousseau (Littré suppl.). Perh. a dim. of casella, cassella, a little cottage, cot (Du Cange), itself dim. of casa house (or of its Romanic representative); less probably, as concerns the sense, = It. cataletto, F. châlit wooden bedstead. (Littré's suggestion of identity with castelletum, châtelet is phonetically untenable, because st becomes in la Gruyère ç, as chastel, tsaçī.)]

1. A hut or cabin on the Swiss mountains, where cattle are lodged in the summer, and where cheese is made; hence, the small wooden house or cottage of the Swiss peasant; gen. a house or villa built in the style of a Swiss cottage. Also, a small, usually wooden, dwelling for holiday-makers.

[L. calix, calic-em cup, has appeared in Eng. in various forms. (1) Early OE. celic, genitive celces, corresp. to OS. kelik (MDu. kelec, kelc, Du. kelk), OHG. kelihh, chelih (MHG. and mod.G. kelch):—WGer. kalik*, an early (pre-Christian) adoption of L. calic-em. (2) The Latin word was re-adopted in later OE., in Christian use, as calic, cælic, cælc, whence early ME. calc, calch (cf. ON. kalk-r). (3) These were ousted in 12th c. by the OF. caliz, calice. (4) Before 1350 this was in turn ousted by a central OF. form chalice, which gave Eng. chalis, chalice. While this was the case in English, in France itself calice was the form which came down to modern French. (OF. caliz, calice was of learned origin, but early enough to undergo the phonetic change to chalice in central F.; in the struggle between the two forms, the influence of L. calix, familiar in ecclesiastical use, was effective in making calice the ultimate victor.) Strictly, cel(i)c, calch, calice, chalice, are separate words; but their relations are best seen by treating them together.]

Chemically, chalk consists of carbonate of lime with some impurities. Geologically, it is a deep-sea formation composed of fragments of shells of Foraminifera, abounding in certain important animal fossils, and interspersed with nodules of flint. It is burned for lime, and prepared for writing or marking on blackboards or other dark surfaces. In 17–18th c. it is often mentioned as eaten by young women suffering from chlorosis: cf. quot. 1811.
